

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

PREFACE.

THE singular collection of original ballads, briefly described in the following pages, consists exclusively of pieces in the black-letter or old English type, nearly all of which belong, moreover, to that rarest and most interesting class, the really vernacular fugitive ballads of the common people. There is a wide difference, noticed especially in sheet-ballads of the seventeenth century, between those which emanated from the more cultivated writers, and those which were the authentic productions either of or written for the street ballad-singer. The former are purer in their diction, usually more ambitious as to typography, and are either not embellished with woodcuts, or, if so, with illustrations superior to the rude designs that adorn the others. The latter are, however, by far the more interesting, not merely on account of their greater rarity, but because they are exponents of feelings or manners that are not illustrated by any other sources of so early a period. Even the political ballads in this collection, such as those respecting Charles the Second, are for the most part the contemporary street rude ballads, not the more polished ones; and are of the rarest occurrence, if not unique.

Great pains have been taken in the formation of the collection, nearly every black-letter ballad of interest that has occurred for sale during the last sixteen years having been secured. The only collections at all approaching it in extent are the Pepysian at Cambridge, the Wood at Oxford, and the Roxburghe in the British Museum, all of which are permanently secured, and can never be distributed; but no collection of equal extent and importance is known to exist in private hands, and so unusual is the occurrence of anything of the kind for sale, that no labour and expense could succeed in forming a similar one.

A small number (about 150) were purchased as having been duplicates of ballads in the Roxburghe collection, but it was found on examination that scarcely any were exact duplicates, several were much earlier and better copies, while others were different editions of the same ballad, often with different woodcuts. It is very rarely that two early black-letter ballads occur as perfect duplicates. Many editions of each were generally printed, and they are all distinguished by peculiarities worthy of notice. A few specimens of different editions of the same ballad will be found in the following collection.

The curiosity and rarity of these fugitive pieces speak for themselves, and all unnecessary observations on their value and importance have been avoided; but there is a remark upon such relics made by a distinguished prelate, himself an ardent lover of them, which may not be an inappropriate conclusion to these few prefatory lines—"Yet have they, for the most part, a pleasing simplicity, and many artless graces, which, in the opinion of no mean critics, have been thought to compensate for the want of higher beauties, and, if they do not dazzle the imagination, are frequently found to interest the heart."
